

10-1-2005

Violence Unveiled

Louise Cainkar

Marquette University, Louise.Cainkar@mu.edu

Published version. Contexts, Vol. 4, No. 4 (2005): 67. DOI.

© 2005 by the Regents of the University of California/Sponsoring Society or Association. Copying and permissions notice: Authorization to copy this content beyond fair use (as specified in Sections 107 and 108 of the U. S. Copyright Law) for internal or personal use, or the internal or personal use of specific clients, is granted by [the Regents of the University of California/on behalf of the Sponsoring Society] for libraries and other users, provided that they are registered with and pay the specified fee via Rightslink® on Caliber (<http://caliber.ucpress.net/>) or directly with the Copyright Clearance Center, <http://www.copyright.com>.

violence unveiled

Arab Muslim women were nearly twice as likely as Arab Muslim men to face verbal assaults in the three years following the 9/11 attacks. When these assaults occurred in public space, a woman wearing hijab (Muslim head scarf) was present more than 90 percent of the time. Women wearing hijab have been spit at, threatened, hit, and told to “go home,” even though many of these women were born in the United States. The hijab has become the symbol of the “clash of civilizations,” a discourse that frames Arabs and Muslims as essentially at odds with others in the civilized West. While different than the concept of race, the civilizational difference discourse shares many features of racialization in its representations and outcomes: essentialization, stereotypes, discrimination, profiling, exclusion, selective law enforcement, and an attachment to phenotypic traits.

Photo by Louise Cainkar.

Louise Cainkar is a sociologist and Senior Research Fellow at the University of Illinois at Chicago, Great Cities Institute.

Contexts, Vol. 4, Issue 4, p. 67, ISSN 1536-5042, electronic ISSN 1537-6052. © 2005 by the American Sociological Association. All rights reserved. Please direct all requests for permission to photocopy or reproduce article content through the University of California Press's Rights and Permissions website, at www.ucpress.edu/journals/rights.htm.