The Boring Side of the Family

Angela Sorby

HERITAGE STATEMENT:

My father and his family moved to Seattle, Washington, from Norway in 1957. WWII had devastated Norway’s economy and my grandfather, Aage, found better prospects painting houses in the Ballard area of Seattle, which was populated largely by other Scandinavian immigrants.

THE BORING SIDE OF THE FAMILY

Their dramas were too minor even for the local paper, Arbeiderbladet. No “family lore” either—no drunks, no runaway brides.

Climate’s half to blame, though the dull nail in the dull coffin was Christianity, a faith that carried them mildly on its back, like Mary and Joseph’s donkey. It walked. It never spooked.
Lady Luck? Good fortune?
No: they were Lutheran, and what they had was Norway, though its fjords and peaks allowed only partial visibility.

They carried it across the ocean and unpacked it in Seattle: Norway. My grandmother taught piano, playing with perfect posture the music of composers more tortured than herself, while my grandfather carved Mickey Mouses (Mice?)

from scrap lumber.
His Mickeys were clever contraptions: gravity forced their hinged legs down a slope, Hop! Click! Hop!

But then Disney lawyers sent him a threatening letter, so he boxed up his mice in the basement, which was a “finished” second house under the first: same wall-to-wall carpet, same muted pinkish furniture.

Later, my grandfather told us that in 1940s Norway, during the German Occupation, toy factories were repurposed to make weapons, so he fed his family of five by covertly making and selling Mickey Mice while out of earshot the Resistance built bombs and blew up bridges.

Hop! Click! Hop! And I thought, yawn. Absent gunpowder, absent an internal vein of evil, goodness grows plain, rural and bland as boiled potatoes.
Only after they died—all of them,
Walt Disney, my grandparents, the Nazis—did I realize how intense it is to pull off the pot lid and stick a fork in, to find that, yes, the potatoes are ready, low on scent and spice but dense with the starch and sugar that forces one eye to spring, underground,
from the eye of another.
