Making Interfaith Conversations Central to Our Jesuit Mission: Why and How to Get Started

Russell C.D. Arnold

Follow this and additional works at: http://epublications.marquette.edu/conversations

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://epublications.marquette.edu/conversations/vol51/iss1/24
Why and How to Get Started

By Russell C. D. Arnold

Students come to college with previous experiences of religious diversity and the expectation that their college experience will extend these experiences. Are we in Jesuit colleges and universities ensuring that such encounters happen on our campuses and that students are getting the most from these encounters? Are we equipping our students to become interfaith leaders who, “through addressing diverse faith identities in interaction, strengthen a religiously diverse democracy” (Eboo Patel, Interfaith Leadership: A Primer, 6).

When I came to Regis three years ago, one of the statements I heard repeatedly was that “our goal is not to make you a Catholic, we want you to be a better ‘whatever you are.’” This statement aspires beyond tolerance of diversity toward a transformative encounter with the religious other. Are our institutions committed to making this aspiration a cornerstone of our culture and practice as Jesuit, Catholic universities? The question is whether we see the development of interfaith leaders as central or peripheral to our mission.

The Vatican II document on interfaith relationships, Nostra Aetate, exhorts Catholics to engage in “dialogue and collaboration with the followers of other religions” in order to “preserve and promote the good things, spiritual and moral, as well as the socio-cultural values found among” such people, promoting “for the benefit of all mankind social justice and moral welfare, as well as peace and freedom.”

Similarly, the 34th General Congregation of the Society of Jesus articulates the centrality of interfaith to the mission of the Society, recognizing that “[t]o be religious today is to be interreligious in the sense that a positive relationship with believers of other faiths is a requirement in a world of religious pluralism.” We must recognize that this call to “be interreligious” is not for clergy and the professionally religious alone. Rather, interfaith leaders are necessary in every office, every classroom, every workplace, and every neighborhood.

Our mission calls us to train effective interfaith leaders. This work is not optional, but an obligation across the curriculum and across campus. Here are three principles that can help us create rich spaces for interfaith dialogue and engagement: identity as a process, encounter, and generous translation.

Identity as Process

Most people think of interfaith dialogue as a Jew, a Christian, and a Muslim on a panel talking about each religion’s views about prayer or God or justice. This model communicates that interfaith dialogue is only for those whose religious identity is strong and fits securely within the boundaries of a single tradition. This is simply not the experience of a growing percentage of our students. By defining “faith” not as a label identifying which religion I belong to but rather as my dynamic relationship with the religion(s)/worldviews...
We’re All Dying
So Let’s Talk About It
By Michael Pagano

I grew up in a three-bedroom house in Oklahoma, where my mother was Irish and my father was Italian. As the oldest of four, I was told about my paternal grandparents, who died before I was born, and how they had spent the last weeks of their lives in my bedroom. Thus it was not surprising that when my mom’s parents and siblings, as well as my dad’s sisters, were dying, the bedroom that my brothers and I shared became the family hospice. Over the years, numerous relatives took over our room and we moved to couches while they spent their final time on earth with us. My mom would cook and care for them and we would come home from school and sit and talk to them about our day – their deaths were part of our lives.

Coupled with my career choices (combat medic in Vietnam and an emergency room physician assistant), my experiences have been almost as much about dying as about living. But that is not the 21st-century norm and this reality creates problems when teaching health communication. Repeatedly, regardless of whether they hail from communication, health studies, or professional fields (e.g., M.D., R.N., P.A., etc.), students will say the same thing: “I haven’t talked with people who are dying.”

For adolescents and young adults whose next 40-50 years will likely include the deaths of countless family and friends, students need to be effective end-of-life communicators. Fortu-